

MP-2002/06/20 – Random Stuff

Editing... I spent a bit of time going through my photos in chronological order and picking out ones I thought I might use... and by the time I got around to putting them together with text, they are quite dated season wise! And so I've filed them away for now, and just grabbed some photos that I took within the past week – the first few yesterday.

With a hot, but not overly hot, early afternoon sun beaming down, the sidewalk reminded me of nearly forgotten summers back during my childhood.

The book district... specifically used books. I've taken to wandering around here at lunch.....

Lunch is a great time for trying out restaurants, as many otherwise rather expensive places have great lunches for quite reasonable prices

Goodbye sixth floor, hello third floor dungeon... I am in fact writing these very words at the desk in the two pictures above. It's 21:28 now - and my dark brown desk is being taken away to the seventh floor tomorrow afternoon (sob). (I'm getting a cheaper - same size at least - white one instead.) I'm listening to music on those little tiny speakers, and enjoying my last night here before the move down.

Middle: Kilometer Zero at Tokyo Station. Trains going toward Tokyo are “Upward bound” trains, while those going away are “Downward bound”. Right: A hanko shop. “Get your ‘signature’ here!”

BANG!!! Can you see the spot of red in the left-hand corner of the above photo? That was encased within a black case before it exploded last week – closing the curtains on this electronic window... I can't complain though, as that TV worked for over 16 years without electronic complaint or repair. It sure was a surprise though! I've never had parts within my electronic devices explode before.....